

Expert witness survey 2025

The June 2025 issue of Your Witness launched our survey questionnaire, the sixteenth of its kind over the past 30 years. By the end of July 2025, some 240 forms had been returned. A big thank you to all who took the trouble to take part and contribute data.

The experts

Of the 240 experts who responded by the end of July 2025, 90 were medical practitioners. Of the remaining experts, 41 were engineers, 15 were in professions ancillary to medicine, 17 were accountants or bankers, 26 had scientific, veterinary or agricultural qualifications, 12 were surveyors or valuers and 15 were architects or building experts. The 'others' category totalled 24 experts.

Work status and workload

Of the respondents, 46% undertake expert witness work full time, with 42% part time and 10% describing themselves as retired. Overall, expert witness work accounts for 59% of their workload. This figure was 37% in 2003 and rose to 45% in 2011. It is the sixth time over the past 30 years that this percentage has been more than 50%. We are looking, therefore, at experts who are mixing their forensic work with other activities, or are undertaking forensic work in retirement.

It is clear, then, that those experts who responded are much involved in expert witness work but still have a strong commitment to their professions – exactly as it should be.

Experience and outlook

We also asked respondents to confirm for how long they have been undertaking expert witness work. From their answers it is apparent that they are a very experienced lot indeed. Of those who replied, 91% have been practising as expert witnesses for at least 5 years, and 83% have been undertaking this sort of work for more than 10 years. Ten years ago, well over half of the respondents (60%) saw expert witness work as an expanding part of their workload. With the increased regulatory pressures, the removal of expert witness immunity, and the impact of a pandemic, this had fallen to 45% in 2023. But optimism appears to be growing again! We now see 50% of respondents expecting expert witness work to be a growth area.

Nature of the work

The way the workload of these experts is partitioned between the various courts is little changed from 2015. Our respondents state that, on average, they perform 82% of their expert witness work in civil courts, 5% in family courts and 13% in criminal courts. Near 60% of these experts undertake civil work exclusively. This dominance of civil matters over the other courts is a long-standing feature of the make up of the Register's membership.

When we asked in 2013 about publicly funded work, 54% of our respondents undertook no publicly funded work. This percentage has been increasing since then, now standing at 59%. Given the parsimonious pay rates for legal aid cases when compared with fee rates in the open marketplace, this should surprise no one. Of those who do accept publicly funded work, it averages just 32% of their workload, which is a small reversal of an otherwise long-term downwards trend. These data show just how financially unattractive the Ministry of Justice has made publicly funded work for expert witnesses.

When it comes to accepting instructions from litigants in person, only 37% of our respondents (the same as in 2023) agree to such instructions. The vast majority of these experts take just a handful of such cases each year. One of the difficulties that can arise with litigants in person is seen in the increase over the last 10 years in the percentage of experts who require payment on account in such cases – from 38% in 2013 to 57% today.

Their work

Reports

In all of our surveys we have asked how many reports the experts have written during the preceding 12 months. The averages for the past six surveys are given in Table 1. The three types of report are advisory reports not for the court, court reports prepared for one party only and single joint expert (SJE) reports.

Single joint experts

A dramatic rise in the number of SJE instructions between 1999 and 2001 (a jump from 3 to 12 instructions a year as a result of the Woolf reforms) then levelled off. Now, 54% of experts have been instructed as SJE's in the past 2 years (it was 73% in 2011), and on average each expert receives eight such instructions in the year – half of the average in our 2009 survey.

Since the removal of expert witness immunity in January 2011, the role of the SJE has become even more fraught. Working for both sides in a dispute may well lead to a disgruntled party, and either side (or both!) can sue the instructed expert. Indeed, we have heard from experts – even those who until now have been very supportive of the SJE approach – who say that they will no longer undertake such instructions.

Court appearances

Another change over the years has been the reduction in the number of civil cases that reach court. It is now altogether exceptional for experts to have to appear in court in fast-track cases, and it is becoming less likely in the multi-track. In 1997 we found the average frequency of court appearances was five times a year; some 4 years later this had dropped to 3.8; it now stands at 1.3.

Variation by specialism

However, these averages hide a lot of variation by specialism (see Table 2). For example, the reporting rate for medics is much greater than in all other specialisms. Furthermore, SJE appointments are much more common in medical cases than in the other specialisms.

Their fees

Which brings us to the detail everyone wants to know. How much are fellow experts charging for their expert witness services? See Table 3.

For each professional group, the table offers average hourly rates for writing reports and full-day rates for attendance in court, with the 2023 data for ease of comparison. Given the small sample size of some of the groups, it would be unwise to read too much into the changes revealed by these pairs of figures.

In terms of annual income from their expert witness work, 18% of our respondents earn less than £20k per year, 20% earn between £20k and £50k per year and 57% earn over £50k per year.

Cancellation fees

Fees due as a result of cancelled trials continue to be a source of friction. The average percentage of the normal fee experts charge is generally controlled by the amount of notice they receive of the cancellation. In this survey, 54 respondents charge on average 37% of their fee if notice is given at least 28 days before the trial is due, 101 respondents charge 48% with 14 days' notice, 141 charge 63% on 7 days' notice and 166 charge 87% if just 1 day's notice is given.

The right to cancellation fees is one that has to arise from the contract between the expert and the lawyer, although the Ministry of Justice has made claiming them very difficult in publicly funded cases. This ought to act as yet another spur to all experts to put in place clear, written terms of engagement.

Speed of payment

In this survey, 82% report the promptness with which invoices are paid has not deteriorated. But that doesn't mean everything is rosy! The number of experts reporting their bills are being paid on time in even half of their cases is 49% (down from 57% in 2021, but up from 40% in 2023). On average, 34% of solicitors pay within 8 weeks, 22% pay between 9 and 12 weeks, 34% pay between 13 and 48 weeks and 14% take more than 48 weeks to pay.

When a payment problem persists, suing the lawyer for payment is the final option. In this survey 27% of respondents had issued a money claim through the courts for unpaid expert witness fees at some point in the last 5 years. That sounds bad enough, but it is down from 33% in 2023 and 45% in 2021!

Against this background, while 90% of experts say they stipulate terms, still only 55% use a written form of contract. Without a solid contractual basis, experts are making their credit control much more complex than it need be. All experts listed in the UK Register of Expert Witnesses have access to our Terminator service through our website (see page 8) to create personalised sets of terms, and our Little Book on *Expert Witness Fees*¹ has a chapter dedicated to terms.

Jackson Reforms

When it comes to the 'hot tub', 17% of our respondents have 'dipped their toe in the water', up from 8% in 2013 and 15% in 2019. This time, 71% of these think hot tubbing is an improvement, around the same as those who did so in our 2023 survey.

In 2013, 40% of respondents had been asked to provide a costs budget. This had increased to 63% in 2017 but has fallen back to 45% in 2023 and now stands at 41%. This latest drop doubtless reflects the introduction of the intermediate track in October 2023 which did away with cost budgeting for a vast swathe of civil claims. Experts continue to find it a challenge to generate accurate budgets at the outset of an instruction.
